

Parents, Guardians, and Custodians in Child Abuse and Neglect Cases – 2 of 4 Fact Sheet

Introduction

Remember that you have a right for an attorney to represent you. If you cannot afford to pay for an attorney, then one will be provided for you by the court.

Types of Court Hearings

During a dependency or neglect case, you may have to go to several court hearings so the Judge can listen to information presented from all parties and decide what will happen.

Types of hearings in child abuse and neglect cases and time frames in which they should happen:

- emergency hearing: within five working days
- adjudication hearing (trial): within 60 days
- disposition hearing: within six months
- review hearing: at least every six months
- permanency planning hearing: within 12 months from the date the child was removed from the home
- termination of parental rights hearing: within 150 days from the date of the permanency planning hearing

Each court hearing has a different purpose. The hearings listed above are described in the sub-sections below. Read through these descriptions so you will know when each hearing should be held, what to expect at each hearing, and why it is very important for you to be present at each hearing.

Emergency Hearing

The emergency hearing must be held within five working days from the date of the filing of the order that the Judge signs taking custody from you. The purpose of the emergency hearing is for the Judge to decide whether there is reason to continue the emergency order removing the child from your custody.

At the emergency hearing, the Judge will decide whether your child can safely live with you, stay in the temporary custody of the Department of Human Services (DHS), or live with someone else until the adjudication hearing (trial) is held. The Judge's decision is based on what is necessary for your child's safety and best interests.

If your child does not return to your home at this hearing, the Judge will make a decision about visitation between you and your child. The Judge may also make decisions about any services that the DHS will provide to your family.

The attorney for the DHS will present information about the case to the Judge. You can give information to the Judge at this hearing. If you have an attorney at that hearing, your attorney will also be able to present information. If you do not have an attorney, cannot afford to hire one, and the child was removed from your custody, the Judge will appoint an attorney to represent you if you ask.

At the emergency hearing, the Judge will give you the time and date of the next hearing, which is called the adjudication hearing.

Adjudication Hearing (Trial)

The adjudication hearing is sometimes called a trial. It must be held within 60 days after the emergency hearing, unless there is a good reason for having the hearing at a later date. But, the adjudication hearing cannot be held later than 60 days from the date that the emergency hearing was held.

The purpose of the adjudication hearing is for the Judge to decide if your child has been abused or neglected. At this hearing, the Judge listens to evidence about why the case first came to court.

Witnesses will tell what they know about the facts of the case. Your attorney can ask them questions. Your attorney can have you, and any other people you want, to tell the Judge about the facts of the case.

After the Judge hears all the witnesses and other information, they will decide if your child is dependent (abused) or neglected. If the Judge decides that your child is not dependent nor neglected, the case will be dismissed, and your child will be returned to your custody and can go home with you.

If the Judge decides that your child is dependent or neglected, the Judge will decide what needs to happen to you, your child, and your family so that your child can be returned to you. This decision is called the disposition.

Disposition Hearing

The disposition hearing is usually held at the same time, or immediately after the adjudication hearing. If not, the disposition hearing must be held within 14 days from the date that the adjudication hearing was held.

At the disposition hearing, the Judge decides if it is in your child's best interests to stay in the custody of the DHS, be placed in the custody of someone else, or be returned to you.

At this hearing, the Judge will make some orders and approve a case plan for you and your child. These court orders and the case plan require that the DHS give some services to you, your child, and your family so that you can keep your child safely in your home or work toward having your child returned to you.

It is very important that you work with the DHS and obey the Judge's orders. If you do not do these things, the Judge can hold you in contempt of court, and it could take longer for your child to be returned to you. In fact, if you do not obey the Judge's orders, you could go to jail and even lose your rights to your child forever. In order for your child to be returned to you, you must show that you can protect and care for your child.

Review Hearing

The first review hearing must be held within six months from the date your child was taken out of the home. The next review hearing must be held within six months after the first review hearing.

The Judge may have the review hearing sooner if it is needed. You could be ordered to attend more than one review hearing during the time that your case is under the Judge's direction.

The purpose of a review hearing is for the Judge to:

- make sure that everyone is obeying the court orders and the case plan
- see how your child is doing in their placement
- see what you are doing to work on the problems that brought the case to court
- see whether the case plan needs to be changed
- see whether the DHS is giving you, your child, and your family the right kind of services to make it possible for your child to return to your home
- see if it is now safe for your child to return to your home

Permanency Planning Hearing

The permanency planning hearing is a hearing for the Judge to decide on a plan for permanent placement for your child.

The permanency planning hearing must be held no later than 12 months from the date your child was removed from the home. But the Judge can decide to hold the permanency planning hearing before that 12-month period.

At this hearing, the Judge listens to all the information about what has happened since the case first came into court. The Caseworker for the Division of Children and Family Services must say what they think is best for your child as far as the permanent plan for placement. Then the Judge must decide which one of these goals is in your child's best interests for your child's permanent:

- return your child to your custody
- continue the goal for your child to be returned to your custody if you are making the right kind of progress and the Judge determines that other things are being done that the law demands

- approve a plan for termination of your parental rights (this means your child can be adopted by someone else)
- approve a plan to place your child in the permanent custody of someone else
- keep your child in foster care for a long time so that your child can learn how to be independent and can take care of themselves when grown and out of foster care

If the Judge decides that your child can be returned to you, then the Judge can order your child be returned to you at this hearing or at another specific date. Depending on what the Judge decides, you may have to come back to court for one or more hearings. Remember, it is very important for you to be present at every hearing.

Termination of Parental Rights Hearing

The purpose of a termination of parental rights hearing is for the Judge to decide whether to end the legal relationship between a parent and child. The court action to terminate parental rights starts with the filing of a Petition to Terminate Parental Rights. The DHS attorney or the Attorney Ad Litem (the child's attorney) must file this petition.

The Petition to Terminate Parental Rights is usually filed after the permanency planning hearing is held and the Judge has decided that the child's permanency planning goal shall be adoption. But, it is important to know that the Petition to Terminate Parental Rights can be filed at any time—even before the permanency planning hearing is held.

If a Petition to Terminate Parental Rights is filed, you will be given a copy, which will list the reasons that the Attorney for the DHS or the Attorney Ad Litem (the child's attorney) thinks your parental rights should be terminated. You will also be given information about the time, date, and place where the termination of parental rights hearing will be held. A termination of parental rights hearing is a very serious hearing, because you could lose your rights to your child forever if the Judge terminates parental rights. To terminate parental rights, the Judge must have "clear and convincing" information that the legal relationship between parent and child should end.

In a termination of parental rights hearing, the Judge must decide if a parent is unfit and if it is in the child's best interests to terminate parental rights. There are many reasons that the Judge can decide that you are an unfit parent and terminate your parental rights. This does not mean that you are a bad person.

You can be found to be an unfit parent because 12 months or less have gone by since the adjudication hearing (trial) and, even though you have been offered help, you still have not done the things required by your case plan. There are other legal reasons that can cause the Judge to terminate your parental rights.

If the Judge does terminate your parental rights, the legal relationship between you and your child will end. This means that, even though you will always have a blood relationship to your child, you will no longer be a legal parent to your child. This also means that everyone in your family will no longer be legally related to your child. Your child will be free for adoption. You will no longer be able to visit your child, talk to your child, write your child, or get any information about your child. The DHS, not you, will be responsible for your child and will make decisions about where your child will live and who can adopt your child.
